

will bring them highly fruitful results. The lines of advance indicated here may be said to represent "a few comparatively insignificant veins of a rich mine of the same material," which needs only "careful working to yield an abundant produce." In fact, the possibilities of this ars in arte are co-extensive with the ingenuity and the intellectual resourcefulness of the writer. The idea which underlies the treatment of the subject in the present volume, and which has been prominently kept in view, is that every group of words that occurs in natural combination, and is hurled off the tongue effortlessly and with the swiftness of a flash, ought to have its stenographic counterpart capable of giving expression to it with equal spontaneity and with almost lightning celerity; in other words, with the least possible physical strain and the maximum dexterity of hand movement.

I can visualize a day, in the very near future, when, as a result of the extensive adoption of all useful time and labour-saving expedients, it will be possible to storm further heights of the speed mountain, when the expert reporter will be able to transmit to the written page, calmly and nonchalantly, the fastest effusions of the tongue; when there will be a greater possibility of a stormy orator pausing a few seconds, either to take breath or think out his next idea, than of the reporter getting fagged physically or ruffled mentally; and when "brethren of the swift pen" will be able to demonstrate in their everyday work the wonderful skill, recorded to have been achieved by their ancient Grecian forerunners in the profession, which has been described by a poet of those times in the following eloquent terms—

Swift though the words
The pen still swifter sped;
The hand has finished
Ere the tongue has said.

CHAPTER I INTRODUCTION

1. It is necessary to offer a word of advice to readers who have not yet studied the Reporter's Phrase Book. I consider it desirable that they should have carefully read and assimilated it before taking up the present work, as otherwise they may find it difficult to get a clear grasp of the principles underlying the construction of the phraseograms embodied here. Incidentally, advantage has been taken of the present publication to provide briefer forms for a few phrases which have already appeared in the Reporter's Phrase Book.

2. The following instructions should be carefully kept in mind—

(i) It is not intended that the student should attempt to master every phrase given here in the order in which it appears. He is advised to go through the whole list carefully and pick out those phraseograms which will be immediately useful to him in, or on the analogy of which he can frame suitable outlines adapted to his particular line of work, and master them in the first instance, leaving others to be taken up in due course, a few at a time, after their groundwork has been thoroughly understood. It is of the greatest importance that the student should, to begin with, grasp the principles on which the phraseograms have been constructed. Once this is done, the task of mastering them will be materially lightened. It should be remembered that no phraseogram has been constructed arbitrarily, although it may appear to be otherwise at first sight.

(ii) If the reader cannot find the requisite time to study and copy the phraseograms systematically, he is advised to glance through them in his spare moments. This practice will have the beneficial effect of keeping vivid images of them in the brain and will help him to utilize them spontaneously at the proper time.

(iii) The use of compact forms for familiar and frequently-occurring clusters of words will not only enable the writer to deal with them comfortably, but also leave a few spare seconds at his command. He can, therefore, well afford to keep up to half a dozen words behind the speaker, especially when he finds that the structure of the passage in hand lends itself to facile joinings.

(iv) The phrases included in this book are the result of a careful study of the genius of the language which, in the course of actual speech, allows wide scope for delivery, at a bound, of innumerable word combinations. The outlines representing them are based in almost every case on certain definite principles which are explained and illustrated in the following pages. They are not arm-chair creations. A great many of them are, in fact, the outcome of ideas that spontaneously suggested themselves in the stress of rapid professional work extending over many years, and have successfully stood the test of time. In some cases, the forms represent almost the limit of brevity, but shorthand writers engaged in the particular line of work in which they are constantly used will have no hesitation in recognizing them at first sight. Let no one, therefore, get needlessly apprehensive at the brevity of any form. It only needs a little patience and intelligent investigation to grasp the successive stages of evolution which have led up to a particularly compact outline. The point may be illustrated by explaining how a remarkably handy and unmistakable form has been arrived at for the familiar string of words—

I should like to draw the attention of the House to the fact:

I should v

I should like v

I should like to draw v

I should like to draw the attention of the House b

I should like to draw the attention of the House to the fact. j

(v) In some cases, two or more phrases have been provided with a common outline. A little reflection will show that there can be no doubt as to which one is meant in a particular context.

3. There are several new features about the phrases incorporated in this treatise which represent a legitimate extension of the principles already indicated in the Reporter's Phrase Book. In order to help the student to get a rational understanding of the framework of these advanced phraseograms, many of the short cuts which require elucidation have been explained in tabular form. The outlines for most of the phrases in the third column will be found in the body of the book and, although, with a view to avoiding repetition, only a few illustrations have been given, it must be obvious to any intelligent reader that the underlying principle in every phraseogram is capable of adoption in several similar combinations which he will do well to work out for himself. In fact, it is my desire to stimulate a spirit of inquiry on the part of the student and encourage him to explore the subject further on his own initiative. For purposes of convenience, the expedients have been grouped under four main headings—

- (a) Blending;
- (b) Doubling (Blending, Intersection or Juxtaposition);
- (c) Intersection; and
- (d) Juxtaposition.

CHAPTER II

ADDITIONAL GRAMMALOGUES AND CONTRACTIONS

I POINTED out in the Reporter's Phrase Book that the grammalogues and contractions were so valuable and indispensable that the scope of their usefulness could be safely enlarged, and I gave a few examples. Experience has shown that there are many words of fairly frequent occurrence, the standard forms for which are somewhat lengthy for very rapid writing, e.g. alternatively, continuous, conscientiously, ridiculously, etc. Such words can, with advantage, be dealt with as contractions and provided with facile forms. I give below a substantial number of additional contractions which were devised for my own use and which I have found to be very useful. I feel sure that a thorough mastery of them will be found to be of material help.
